Are matrix organisations like ships without a captain?

KRAUTHAMMER | London, UK | 30-Jan-2008.

A recent Krauthammer study suggests that the matrix model exists in 85% of the European organisations. The survey further suggests that people agree it is a realistic way of running a business. However, many structural elements seem to be in serious need of attention. As it is, people appear to be navigating complexity without systematic, structural support. According to the survey, only four out of ten people (40%) believe that Human Resources (HR) policy creates supportive operating conditions, and only around half (48%) feel that employees are indeed empowered.
